Jim Leavitt posted:

Before he became an employee of LY&S, Dexter was an adversary. He was a tough claim adjustor at Island Insurance, and we locked horns on several cases. But he was always civil, and gave me good reasons for his (low--in my opinion) offers, and would also listen to my arguments. My memory is a bit fuzzy, but I think we always came to an amicable settlement, because I respected his knowledge and his arguments about the value of my cases. I was happy when John hired him, as he brought a wealth of knowledge with him to our firm. I was often at his office, asking him for his take on some problem I had with some of my cases. Dexter was a good guy. But he was much more than that.. He dealt with his disability as though it didn't exist. I missed him being at the office when he decided to work from home, and I miss him all the more now.
